Read and Say

Once upon a time, a man traveller was walking through a very bare landscape, where nothing much grew. The rivers had dried up and the wind blew hard over the ground. He had walked many miles and found that he had run out of water. So, he was desperate to find some water. Suddenly, he saw a shepherd tending a few sheep. He reached the shepherd and asked for water. The kind shepherd took him to his little stone cottage.

The cottage had a well with excellent water from deep down in the ground. Before going to bed that night, the traveller watched the shepherd counting out the acorns but they were bitter and no good for food. The next day after soaking the acorns in a bucket of water, the shepherd took them and went up the bare hillside. He carried a long metal rod with which he made a hole in the ground for each acorn and planted them all. The traveller asked him "How long have you been doing this?" The shepherd replied "most days for the past three years, I have planted 100,000 acorns in the time". Well, the traveller was amazed. And when he returned home, he always remembered the kind shepherd and wondered how he was. So some years later, the traveller returned to the place again and found the shepherd. He had sold his sheep and now a bee-keeper.

This had come about because the sheep had been eating the young trees. He had continued to plant acorns all the while and now his first acorns were slender oak trees. They walked through the new woods.

"Oh, how wonderful!", thought the traveller. Not only the oak trees as well as a man were growing, but beech trees had also been planted. And the most wonderful thing was happening. The little streams which had long dried up, were running with water again and because of this, other plants were beginning to grow wild with flowers, grass, bushes and shrubs. It was a wonderful sight and that was not all : birds and wild creatures were living there too. The shepherd had done all this by homely. He had created a new countryside just by planting trees. People came to live in that area near the trees. They grew crops on land which was now green and fertile.

One day a girl was going to the school and she was feeling hot. Suddenly the wind blew and the rain started pouring the drops over the girl. The girl became sad as she was going to the school. After walking some distance, the sun started shining brightly as if the sun was very happy and dried up the girl.

After reaching to the school, she shared how sun and wind showed kindness to her.
