

The narrator was caught in a soup when he found a dog and a woman's handbag in his hatchback while returning from the market with some groceries and had to reach home by 10' clock. He went into a tizzy to know that the dog's owners stayed 7 miles in the opposite direction. He also couldn't report his car stolen as he was driving a same type of black car and feared the police might trap him. Of his contrary, all his apprehensions came to naught after he found the farm owners very jocular and served him two cups of coffee. The narrator returned to normalcy after he discovered that he was driving his car and his one was not stolen.
