

It couldn't be done is a poem written by Edgar Albert Guest. The poem is about doing the things that have never been done before and the things that people say you could not do. In the ~~poem~~ poem, "somebody" says to the poet that (it) could not be done but the poet did not reply by making that thing done. This "somebody" time to time tries to convince the poet that he can not do certain things. But the poet proves him wrong by doing what "somebody" believed could not be done. It is uncertain as to what text was it said that it could not be done. The poem is encouraging the readers to do things that never have been done before, even if everyone is saying that it can not be done. The tone is motivational.