Space for Answer

It was a sunny day and a very busy day as well. Everyone at home was very busy doing their work. Amit and his brother were getting ready to go for school. His mother was preparing breakfast for all of them and his father was getting ready to go to his office. But all of a sudden the sky got covered with black clouds and darkness was all over. Then, after some time lightning and rain started with a loud sound. All of them were getting late for their work. But, it was raining very heavily. No one of them could get to work. During that time their whole house started shaking and nobody of them could understand what was happening that day. After two hours the rain stopped and the sunlight erased all the darkness. When they switch on their TV to see what happened they saw that a massive earthquake has taken place and many houses were destroyed and many people were missing. By seeing the news Amit started crying badly and he hugged his parents tightly and he apologised to his parents for arguing very badly with them the previous night. He said the previous night that he will never talk with his parents again but when he saw the news on TV he realised that we should love and take care of loved ones.

This meant my sister thought she knew more about everything than I did and ~~pe~~sterced me about stuff I don't care about - especially English grammar stuff. A few days ago, she asked me, "Do you know about question tags?" I almost choked on my milk, which is not difficult to do because I hate milk.

Anyway, before I could say anything, she went on, "Question tags are little questions that are added to a sentence. Like a tail.

For example — "Here ~~so~~ he assumed the airs of a grammar teacher, "You make a funny face when you drink milk, don't you? Or I am very intelligent, aren't I?" Now, these little questions, 'don't you' and 'aren't I'

are called — "Question tags," I said
