

Mechanical energy is the sum of potential energy and kinetic energy.

The only condition under which mechanical energy is conserved is that all the forces acting on it should be conservative forces.

During the vertical fall of the cylinder tube, if the friction due to air is ignored, the total sum of potential energy and kinetic energy at each point of its remains same.