

The reader of Books

By the time she was three, Matilda had taught herself to read by studying newspapers and magazines that lay around the house. At the age of four, she could read fast and well and she naturally began hankering after books. The only book in their home was something called Easy cooking belonging to her mother, and when she read it from cover to cover and learned all the recipes by heart, she decided she wanted something more interesting.

"Daddy" she said, "do you think you could buy me a book?"

"A book?" said her father. "Whatever do you want a book for?"

"To read, Daddy."

"What's wrong with the telly, for heaven's sake? We've got a lovely telly with a twelve-inch screen and now you come asking for a book! You are getting spoiled, my girl!"

That afternoon, Matilda set out all by herself to walk down to the public library in the village. When she arrived, she introduced herself to the librarian, Mrs Phelps. She asked if she might sit awhile and read a book. Mrs Phelps, slightly taken aback at the arrival of such a tiny girl unaccompanied by a parent, nevertheless told her she was very welcome.

"Where are the children's books, please?" Matilda asked.

"They're over there on the lower shelves," Mrs Phelps told her.

"Would you like me to find a nice one with lots of pictures in it?"

"No, thank you," Matilda said. "I am sure I can manage."

From then on every afternoon, Matilda would toddle down to the library. The walk took only ten minutes and this allowed her two glorious hours sitting quietly by herself in a corner corner devouring one book after another. When she had read every single children's book in the place, she started wandering around in search of something else.

Clever cap-seller

Long time ago a cap-seller was going to the market to sell his caps. The bundle of caps was heavy. He felt tired and decided to rest for sometime. He put his bundle on the ground and slept under a shady tree. Many monkeys lived on that tree. They opened the bundle and put ~~one~~ the cap on their heads. One by one all the monkeys had a cap. When the cap seller woke up he saw the empty bundle. He became very sad. He searched for the missing caps. By chance he looked up and saw the ~~sit~~ monkeys sitting on the branches of the tree. All were wearing caps. He tried many ways to recover the caps but did not succeed. He knew that monkeys imitate very well. He hit upon a plan. He threw his own cap on the ground. The monkeys imitated by throwing their caps on the ground. Happily the cap-seller collected his caps, tied them in the bundle and made his way for the market.
